Your Voice Can Now Span Pacific by 8,700-mile Direct Circuit to Java

The telephone circuit between San Francisco and Java is now in full operation. The long-range wireless transmitter at Santa Cruz is ready for action.

The new direct service in established through the transatlantic stations of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, and the United States Maritime Commission, and it is now being put into active use.

The new service will make it possible to transmit messages directly from the United States to Java and vice versa, without stopping at any intermediate point.

The telephone circuit will be used primarily for the transmission of messages between the United States and Java, but it will also be available for use by other countries.

The telephone circuit is a great improvement over the old cable service, which was limited to a single wire and could not carry as much traffic.

The new circuit will be of great benefit to the United States and Java, and will make it possible to transmit messages more quickly and efficiently.
