VOLUME IV.
BENTON, KENTUCKY, WEDNESDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 7, 1892.
NUMBER 45.

The rights of man are the laws of God. The right of man is the right of the justice, the most reasonable and the most moral. The principles which have been considered as inalienable, and which have been recognized as fair and just by the best and ablest men there has ever been, are, great religious leaders and organizers of society. They have been the pillars of individual and the world's liberty. The liberty that is the essence of all just and all good government. These three interests are for this country never meant to be divided, never meant to be incompatibles, though they have been or are in any way at variance. This is the first point. It's to get at an undertaking so as to work and to get as far as possible as fast as possible.

My next point is that the labor organization should be urged. If it be urged, it should be urged everywhere, and to get it to go in for its best and most important interests. This is the second point. This is not, perhaps, to be urged, the most important thing in our government, but it is, indeed, that we have got to do it, and that we have got to do it in the best and most reasonable interest of every laborer organization engaged in the production of wealth.

One of the facts which were true is that the labor organization should be urged. If it be urged, it should be urged everywhere, and to get it to go in for its best and most important interests. This is the second point. This is not, perhaps, to be urged, the most important thing in our government, but it is, indeed, that we have got to do it, and that we have got to do it in the best and most reasonable interest of every laborer organization engaged in the production of wealth.
