How Westport Got Three-Cent Fares

A FEW weeks after Mr. Lumpkins's incorporation, it was settled by a United States court that the town of Westport, Connecticut, could not be incorporated as a city. The courts held that it was a great public benefit, I suggested, to have a city of the same name, but with the greatest public benefit, I suggested, to have a city of the same name, but with a larger population and better facilities.

When the corporation was formed, I understood that the incorporators were in the world of reform, and that they saw some big economies and other advantages that could be realized in the new city. The incorporators had taken upon themselves the responsibility of advocating the interests of the new city, and I thought it was only fair that they should be heard before the public. The incorporators had taken upon themselves the responsibility of advocating the interests of the new city, and I thought it was only fair that they should be heard before the public.

When the incorporators were asked how they could afford to spend such a large sum of money on such a small city, they replied that they had been able to raise the necessary funds by the sale of some of the city's properties. They had also been able to secure the cooperation of the citizens of the city in the work of building and maintaining the new city's facilities.

The incorporators had been able to secure the cooperation of the citizens of the city in the work of building and maintaining the new city's facilities. They had also been able to secure the cooperation of the citizens of the city in the work of building and maintaining the new city's facilities.
