Cleveland's Inaugural.

The following is contained words, which are put down by the hand of Mr. Harrison, the President of the United States, in his first message to Congress, and which are, we believe, a true representation of all that is said upon the subject:

"To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, in the 49th year of our independence and the 51st of the present Congress: We meet to consider the report of the committee of the whole, tendered by the Senate, and which was referred to us by the Speaker, and the state of the public securities, and the measures necessary for their payment. The report is in the hands of the House, and we have no further to say upon the subject."

The President's message is now before the House for consideration. It is the duty of the House to express its opinion upon the subject. We therefore move to adjourn.
Take Notice

Paul Jones, who was last seen the evening of the 12th of April, has returned from the back country. He is now a changed man. His eyes are bright and his step is brisk. He has brought with him a large assortment of goods, which he plans to sell in the town. He is also bringing with him a new bride, who he says is the love of his life. She is beautiful and kind, and he says he is the happiest man in the world.
