At the same time, Mr. Roosevelt added, it is not the will of the American people that this country should be dominated by any one political party or group. He said that it is the duty of every American to stand by the democratic principles that have guided this country through its trials and triumphs.

Mr. Roosevelt also spoke about the importance of education and the need for increased educational opportunities for all Americans. He urged Congress to pass legislation that would provide for the expansion of public schools and the establishment of a national system of education.

The President said that it is the responsibility of all Americans to work together for the betterment of our country. He called on all citizens to participate in the political process and to vote in the upcoming elections.

Mr. Roosevelt concluded his speech by expressing his confidence in the future of the United States. He said that with the support of the American people, the country can overcome any obstacle and achieve great things.

The President then took questions from the audience, which included questions about foreign policy, economic issues, and social welfare programs. He answered these questions with the same energy and enthusiasm that characterized his entire speech.

The President's speech was well-received by the audience, who listened intently and then gave him a standing ovation. The speech was a fitting conclusion to the President's time in office, as he had been a leader of the Democratic Party and a strong advocate for its policies throughout his presidency.

The President then left the stage, and the audience parted, well-satisfied with the final performance of the man they had known and loved for so many years. He had been a leader, a spokesman, and a symbol of hope for millions of Americans, and he would be remembered for his contributions to the country and the world.
