The Uneedus Circle of the First Methodist Woman's Missionary Society...
A million years ago, when our ancestors were still flint-throwing stone Age men, they spoke a language that was quite different from modern English. The language of our distant ancestors was more like that of a modern African tribe. It was a language of gestures and sounds that was passed down from generation to generation by word of mouth. Today, we only have a few clues to what that language might have been, but we can imagine how it might have sounded and what it might have said.

There is a story that has been told in many cultures around the world. It is a story about a man who has been lost at sea for many years. He has been alone on a small boat, with only his own thoughts and the endless ocean for company. One day, he sees a distant ship on the horizon. He划s his knees and calls out, "Help! Help!" But his voice is carried away by the wind and the vast expanse of water. He划s alone again, but this time, he is not afraid. He划s learned to live with his thoughts and the quiet of the sea.

Now, imagine that this man has been lost at sea for many years. He划s been driven mad by his isolation, his fear, and his hopelessness. He划s been living on a small boat, with only his own thoughts and the endless ocean for company. One day, he sees a distant ship on the horizon. He划s overcome with joy and he calls out, "Help! Help!" But his voice is carried away by the wind and the vast expanse of water. He划s alone again, but this time, he is not afraid. He划s learned to live with his thoughts and the quiet of the sea.

In other words, the same story can be told in different ways, with different words and different details, but the basic themes remain the same. Love, loss, hope, and survival. And in the end, the meaning of the story is not in the words themselves, but in the way they are used and the emotions they evoke.

The story of the man who has been lost at sea is a powerful example of the way that language can be used to express complex ideas and emotions. It is a reminder that language is not just a tool for communication, but a way of knowing the world and ourselves.
