MEXICO LOOKS TO PEACE INSTEAD OF REVOLUTION

Tomorrow Mexico will witness the peaceful inauguration of a new President instead of the expected revolution overshadowed by the recent presidential election. The installation of the new President at Guadalupe will be challenged by those who have not accepted the election results, and the situation is tense. The new President, Almazán, has promised to work for peace and stability, but his government faces many challenges. The United States, which has a strong presence in Mexico, will be watching closely to ensure that the new administration adheres to the terms of the recently signed treaty.

The installation of the new President will be a significant event for Mexico and the region. The country has faced political instability and social unrest in recent years, and the new administration will need to address these issues to bring about peace and prosperity. The United States, which has a long history of involvement in Mexico, will be closely following the new administration's policies.

While the United States has recognized the candidate accepted by the majority of the electorate, it remains to see how the new administration will handle the situation.
