John Paul Jones had been sent to France on government business. He was in command of a corvette, which was made by John Paul Jones, and I confess that this interesting piece of history is something I never knew of. It seems that during the war against England, 1812, the British had paid a large amount of money to Jones in return for his cooperation.

One party of sailors was to do the duty of covering the point on which the warship was to anchor. John Paul, with that daring and impetuous spirit he had, had taken the vessel into the harbor, and there he was not far from that point. He was not far from that point.

The big scene in the picture was painted by a French artist, and it gave a live view of the scene as night covered. Poetry was much in the air, and the poet laureate was quoted as saying, "The night of life is the most precious poem we can write." The poet laureate was quoting from his own work.

In Los Angeles, the school superintendent is preparing to give four months more of instruction. The plan was announced by the superintendent of schools.

Mr. Spikes was asked if he had any trouble with the police, and Judge Collet pointed to his record. "Babe's record of..." the judge shouted. "That was before I knew better." The judge added he was "confident" of passage. Three resolutions were considered. One required school funds to be distributed on a per capita basis; another would distribute them on a per capita basis; and the third would distribute them on a per capita basis.
