In many cases, an account of a picture appears on a page, and the writer is not sure if the picture is available. The writer should not assume that the picture is available unless it is specifically stated in the text. The writer should also be aware that the picture may not be available due to copyright restrictions or other factors.

The text mentions "some of their blunders," but it is unclear what blunders are being referred to. The writer should provide more context or clarify the meaning of the term "blunders."

There is also a mention of a "meeting in London," but it is not clear what meeting this refers to or where it took place. The writer should provide more information about the meeting to make it clear to the reader.

The text also includes a reference to a "phone number," but it is not clear what phone number is being referred to or how it is relevant to the main topic of the article.

Overall, the text appears to be a collection of unrelated topics and statements, and the writer should provide more context or clarification to help the reader understand the content.
