ECONOMIC HIGHLIGHTS

Any nation which subsidizes its foreign trade, through tariff and export subsidies, is running a serious risk to the time-honored rule, "You get what you pay for." It sends into this country almost no gold, and its imports are being balanced by grants.

It is true that foreign trade is an extremely valuable indicator of national wealth. But not all foreign trade is equally valuable. There are some nations which have a democratic tradition, and are engaged in reciprocal trade agreements, that will not be benefited by our present system of foreign trade. It is not a question of the gold, but of the gold equivalent, which must be paid for by the sale of products of higher value.

The United States Department of Commerce, under the leadership of Mr. Hull, has strongly advised against continued subsidies. In Mr. Hull's view, "...continued subsidies, which are equivalent to the direct expenditure of our own gold by purchase of foreign goods, are a menace to the stability of the world." He believes that the world's prosperity is not only dependent upon the conditions between its various parts, but also upon the relative value of its imports and exports.

Mr. Hull states that he has evidence of a totalitarian system that will not be benefited by our present system of foreign trade. Such a system has been grown in a period of depression, and it is not a question of the gold, but of the gold equivalent, which must be paid for by the sale of products of higher value.

In the fact of the matter, the necessity for a world-wide trade is growing out of a fear of a return to the conditions which would result from the destruction of foreign trade. In the face of this, Mr. Hull states that the United States must be prepared to write a policy to cover any eventuality. He says, "...we must be prepared to write a policy to cover any eventuality. We cannot afford to lose the advantages of a world-wide trade, nor can we afford to lose the advantages of a world-wide trade, nor can we afford to lose the advantages of a world-wide trade."

The term "the new democracy" has been used by politicians and the media, but there is no need to be taken literally. The concept of democracy as a social institution is still in its infancy.

Young men and women, often still in their early twenties, are being trained in the art of public speaking. They have been selected from the best schools in the country and are expected to represent the United States in this important field of endeavor.

The new democracy is a political entity that has been created by the people themselves. It is a society in which all men and women have the right to vote and to participate in the decision-making process. This new democracy replaces the old system of factions, cliques, and special-interest groups. It is a system in which the people have power over their government.
