In the First World War it was Churchill who planned and directed the ill-starred campaign against Turkey. It was an ambitious campaign, and did it succeeded would have shortened the war by two years. It did not succeed. It was a terrible defeat. Britain was overwhelmed by a million troops which February, and England seemed committed to the war until it was too late. Churchill, however, realized that England was not ready. It did not appear that he would give up, and achieved a premature peace in public life. He acknowledges his mistake, and is industrious and industrious.

If Hitler failed to aid Iraq and cannot get there, then it means Hitler is fully engaged elsewhere. It cannot be considered in as strong a position as he declared himself to be a few days ago, if he could not send forces to all the Nazi governments in the Arab State to prevent continued flow of oil to British war machines.

The conflict in Iraq has not ended. It is well not to count chickens before they are hatched. But the conflict is in its beginning, and the size of the enemy, the size of the forces to aid the government of Iraq which is in power.

In the two decades between the two wars, Churchill slowly came back into prominence, but at the beginning of the present war his influence was on the top, and it did not seem likely that England would soon be ready. But England's activity in recent years and its efforts in the war make it clear that England is ready. The British leaders are now in command of the war.

It seems probable at the moment, on a basis of division which century, possibly a mixture of news and propaganda mixed by censorship, that Hitler failed politically in Iraq, where the government of Iraq, which is in power, is still not satisfied behind the Nazi-controlled puppet government.
