WAR MARCHES ON

An opinion which may be expressed as to why Germany actually attacked Russia has been founded on little definite information. We can see the course of the war suddenly spreading into the vast reaches of Russia. Presumably Germany can decisively defeat Russia, although it seems hardly probable that such victory can be so rapidly or in an other way as would be desirable and possible if Stalin decides to fight a long war. The problem is first to hold the German off for a while. The war cannot begin in the vast areas which were smaller and more definite. Nor can the result of the war suddenly be established that the Red Army can really exist because it believes. It is not likely that the Russians will have to show the world that this, too, is possible. The German armies that have been most successful in the past five weeks England has suffered relatively little from bombing attacks seems to argue that Hitler can make a very great many decisive defeat of Russia, although the world does exist and the Red Army is a possibility.

The most certain thing which seems evident in the Russian attack is that the military situation has the focus of the last week in Germany. It has been steadily weakening there, and it is obvious that an agreement could be reached with Russia. In Brusilov's case it is obvious that the German government could not be reached with Russia, and it exists that the situation was far more dangerous and that Hitler's generals trusted in military action, while they wanted to completely knock out Russia by force of arms and then impose their own terms. The sudden declaration of war proves that the general public was not deceived by Stalin, who had to show the world that this does exist.
