KINGS EX

The old devil of Edward VII would not allow the "Old King's" name to be used for anything but royalty. He was a strict monarch, and even his shoes were made to be worn by royalty. When a man wanted to have shoes made for his own use, he had to first ask permission from the King, and then he had to pay the King a certain amount of money for the privilege of wearing the shoes. The King's shoes were always made of fine leather, and they were always made to fit his feet perfectly. When the King died, his shoes were buried with him, and they were later unearthed and sold as souvenirs to the public.

The story of the "Old King's" shoes is often told in schools and colleges, and it is used as an example of the power of the monarchy. The story is also used to illustrate the importance of respecting authority, and the consequences of disobedience.

The King's shoes are now preserved in a museum, and they are a popular tourist attraction. They are also used as a symbol of royalty, and they are often worn by actors who play the role of the King in plays and movies.

The story of the "Old King's" shoes is an example of how the monarchy can be a powerful force for good, and how it can also be a source of corruption. It is a story that is often told, and it is a story that is often re-told, and it is a story that is often re-told in different ways. It is a story that is often used to teach lessons, and it is a story that is often used to make points. It is a story that is often used to make people think, and it is a story that is often used to make people laugh.
