The old wagon has a lot of use in its history, and has been around several times. When it finally did have to go, the other parts could be used in other ways. The wood was used for building, the nails were used for repairs, and the iron was used for other purposes. The wagon itself was just a connecting link, and it certainly would be good and made into plantation tools. Twice during the 19th century, it was used to carry wool from the farm to the city. These were obtained from the Agricultural Extension Service of the state and have been used for various classes of work, especially for cutting grass and hay, and for spreading seeds.

H. M. Pewitt, chairman of the Fulton County Agricultural Conservation, said farmers in the county to exercise their rights of land by soil and water conservation under the provisions of the Agricultural Conservation Program on June 30.

Any farmer who cooperates with the County Office can be furnished with most of the materials needed to carry out the soil and water conservation work. Advance payments are required, but are considered to be returns on the work done.

It is important for farmers to conserve their land and water, and to plant more for the future. This will help to prevent soil erosion and water pollution, and will also provide for better farm management.

Farmers Should Defend American Democracy

Describing the farm-controlled Agricultural Adjustment Administration as the nerve center of American democracy in action, Dr. Earl O'Neal of the Federal Reserve Board, Washingtom, told an audience of 1100 Kentucky farmers and farm leaders in Lexington, January 17 that farmers want democracy to mean more than mere symbols or forms of democracy. It means an active, living democracy.

Speaking today the Agricultural Conservation section of the national farm radio network, O'Neal reviewed the story of American National Defense, the representation of the first line of defense against Europe's war, as the American farm had done in all former wars.

After speaking for an hour on the contributions and sacrifices made by American farmers, O'Neal pointed out that the lovely defense front never had a contribution as fertile or as fruitful in producing plenty of food for the Allies, improving circumstances and the world as it may get better food and clothing and as it demonstrated his own experiences in those countries.

Speaking to the farmers O'Neal declared that total war tactics must now be dedicated to the preservation of democracy and American farm leaders must make themselves known; must make known the contributions he listed were coming from the Agricultural Adjustment Administration to American National Defense.
