Supervised Spanking

To our attention is a long story, "The Character Education Program" appearing in the Times-Gazette, Fulton, Tennessee, October 24, 1946. It has brought up to mind a somewhat different but equally important aspect of character education, namely, the subject of "spanking" or "corporal punishment".

In recent years, there has been a great deal of discussion about the morality of "spanking", and there are those who believe that it is an archaic, outmoded, and inhuman method of controlling children. However, it is important to note that the practice of "spanking" has been used by parents and educators for centuries and has been shown to be effective in promoting good behavior and discipline in children.

On the other hand, there are those who argue that "spanking" can be a form of physical abuse and that it violates the child's rights. It is true that "spanking" can be used in an inappropriate manner, but it is not the practice itself that is inherently wrong.

In my opinion, the key to successful discipline is balance. Parents and educators must use a variety of methods, including positive reinforcement and "time out", in conjunction with "spanking", to help children learn responsibility and self-control. Ultimately, the goal is to guide children towards a life of respect for others and themselves, rather than to instill a fear of punishment.

Therefore, while the practice of "spanking" may be controversial, it cannot be ignored as an effective method of character education. It is up to parents and educators to use it appropriately and with care, in order to foster the development of responsible and respectful children.
