Living Memorials

Americans have long been accustomed to paying tribute to their heroes. But the mourning of the war dead has been institutionally expressed through the creation of monuments, memorials, and other forms of commemoration. The need for such tributes to valor and patriotism is especially pronounced in times of national crisis.

Critical Conditions

When Secretary Marshall reported to the Senate foreign relations committee that the world is in a very critical condition, he wasn't talking what he would and should do. But although the situation is serious, he and his colleagues may be expected to act in line with the national interest.

Tributes to valor and patriotism are as important now as they were in the past.

There are cases when a person's condition may be so serious that he is not expected to live. There is no reason to believe that he was taken unawares. There is sufficient cause without a doubt, to believe that he is in mortal danger.

When a community seeks to commemorate the death of its fallen fighting sons, it is a right and proper thing to do. The community may be expected to do it. The community should support the national interest.

Violations of the 25-mile speed limit posted along the state highways are regular occurrences. In the City of Fulton, Police Chief A. W. Wheeler and Patrolman J. B. Hopper have been on the lookout for speeding motorists, and on several occasions they have been successful in enforcing the speed laws. The patrols have resulted in the apprehension of numerous motorists who were traveling in excess of the posted speed limits. The patrols have been especially effective in reducing the number of accidents caused by speeding.
