CHAPTER TWENTY-NINE

THE next day being a Saturday, Henri was nome early, and he decided to have a talk with Leonic at ut her reading. He found her propped up on her bed, looking at a magazine. She had, been silent at dinner, now he noted that she was pale.

"Leonic," he said, "Tye been a bit worried about you."

"There's nothing to worry about," Leonic said.

"You know we have your interest at heart in anything we do."
Henri preluded, Leonic looked uncompretable. "Now, there are certain things that your lack of experience when you're as old as we are—not fitting—"

"What is there to do?
