Tobacco Blossom

Adoption as the National Flower

In February, 1886, the United States House of Representatives passed a resolution that introduced the tobacco plant as a potential symbol of American nationhood. The resolution called for the selection of a national flower, and the tobacco plant was among the candidates. The proposal was later discussed in the Senate, where it faced opposition due to concerns about the plant's association with tobacco use. Despite this, the tobacco plant remained a popular candidate. In 1913, a bill was introduced in the House of Representatives to designate the tobacco plant as the national flower, but it was not adopted. The issue was revisited in the 1930s, and the tobacco plant was considered again, but this time, it faced even more opposition. In 1940, a bill to designate the tobacco plant as the national flower was introduced in the Senate, but it did not advance. The tobacco plant has never been officially designated as the national flower, but its status as a symbol of American industry and culture persists.

CHARLES HAYFORD

There is a long list of names which have been written on the door of "The Palace," although most of them have been scratched off. Among those who have been there, a few of the names are still visible. The names of those who have been there are, among others, "Charles Hayford," "Monroe," and "McKinley." Among the names, "Charles Hayford," who has been there only a short time, is the most prominent. He is a tall man with a large, round face and a long nose. His eyes are blue and his hair is gray. He is wearing a black frock coat and a blue vest.
